

Depression is common, real, and treatable.

Feeling low now and then is part of being human. But when low mood lingers for weeks and starts to dim everything — sleep, energy, interest, hope — that's depression, and it's a health condition, not a weakness or something to 'snap out of'. With the right help, most people get better.

How depression can show up

Low or flat mood

Persistent sadness, emptiness or tearfulness — or feeling numb and 'switched off'.

- Most days, for two weeks or more.

Losing interest

Things you used to enjoy stop feeling worthwhile, fun or rewarding.

- Sometimes the first sign before sadness.

Sleep & energy

Sleeping too little or too much, and feeling drained even after rest.

- Early-morning waking is common.

Appetite & focus

Eating more or less than usual, and finding it hard to concentrate or decide.

- Weight can drift up or down.

Harsh self-talk

Guilt, worthlessness, or feeling you're a burden to those around you.

- Depression distorts how you see yourself.

Physical symptoms

Aches, headaches or gut symptoms with no clear cause can be part of it too.

- The body feels low mood as well as the mind.

Low mood, or something more?

Everyone feels down sometimes — that usually lifts within days. Depression is deeper and lasts longer: low mood or lost interest most of the day, most days, for two weeks or more, affecting how you function. If that sounds like you, it's worth seeing your GP — this is exactly what we're here for.

Small steps that can help alongside treatment

1

Keep a rhythm

Regular sleep, meals and getting up help anchor the day

2

Move your body

Even a short daily walk genuinely lifts mood

3

Stay connected

Tell one person you trust; don't withdraw alone

4

Be kind to yourself

Small wins count; limit alcohol, which lowers mood

Please see your GP soon if:

- Low mood has lasted more than two weeks
- It's affecting work, study, family or self-care
- You're sleeping or eating very differently
- You're using alcohol or drugs to cope
- You feel hopeless, trapped or worthless
- Any thoughts of harming yourself — please reach out today

What your GP can offer

- ✓ A calm, confidential conversation — no judgement
- ✓ A Mental Health Care Plan for subsidised psychology
- ✓ Talking therapies such as CBT
- ✓ Antidepressant medicine if it's right for you
- ✓ A check for causes like thyroid, iron or B12
- ✓ Regular review — we adjust until you feel better

Reaching out is the hardest, bravest step

Depression lies and tells you nothing will help. It's wrong.
